

something that's probably been in existence for a long time," Pitch said good can come of the ordeal.

"After they get over their anger, I think they'll feel it was not all in vain and that they're now going to save Canadians and protect their health from other future happenings "

While lawyer Ted Charney, who also represents plaintiffs in the suit, agrees those he represents will find some answers, he doesn't believe the report goes far enough.

"The report is a good start, but it barely scratches the surface in terms of what needs to be done to maintain the integrity of our food delivery system in this country," he said, "especially given that it's emerging as the largest class of diseases we're going to be facing in the future."

Still, for those who were directly affected, nothing will restore their trust.

Adrienne Adie, a plaintiff in the suit, wound up in hospital after eating a ham sandwich last summer. She believed she would die from food poisoning that felt "like your whole insides are coming out."

"My trust is gone. The only comfort I have is I don't buy anything from Maple Leaf."

Please Log In or Register FREE

You are currently not logged into this site. Please log in or register for a FREE ONE Account Logged in visitors may comment on articles, enter contests, manage home delivery holds and much more online. Your ONE Account grants you access to features and content across the entire CanadaEast Network of sites.

Disabled

Commenting has been disabled for this item. Existing comments appear below but you may not add a new comment at this time.